

And how could it be without our dear and many-esteemed spectators? Without them, all performances are meaningless, because the play is staged just for them! And we had a lot of them at the two performances of the Drama Club: both times it was sold out and the hall was filled to its maximum, 30 people at each performance. As the well-known proverb says: "As many people, as many opinions", – so we decided to find out the impressions of the play not only from the actors but also directly from the audience of the performance. Miss Sophie, the school's head librarian, had a lot of warm words to say about the work done by the troupe.

"I think the performance was very well staged, I liked the way you worked together. Although it wasn't an easy production, I saw that you all tried very hard and that made it very interesting. Why did I like it? First, like I said, because you worked very well together, and second because not many props were used in the process. I liked the fact that everything was very minimalist. Just you and the chairs and the occasional veil all worked together, and the audience was focused on you and not the props around you."

According to Miss Sophie, she looks forward to future performances. As a faithful audience member, she will come and applaud, take pictures, and videotape the performances. And there are even more performances expected than the first semester: a less immersive and more classical performance, based on Daniel Keyes' book "Flowers for Algernon," which will be released in late March, and a poetry performance that will represent the voices of students and teachers, so they are working on the production "from cover to cover".

In closing, Miss Sophie had the following farewell words for the drama club participants:

"I would encourage the actors to work more together because they worked so well together before. Sometimes they didn't even realize but they were doing the same movement, it's because they were in sync. I know that Mrs. Kamila had worked with them a lot and I could see that. In her way, she had made the actors shine separately and shine together. <...> And all of the students should be so proud and also thankful to Mrs. Kamila for working with you because she did a wonderful job."
